

ALLAN JONES: from the Dark Coal-mine to the Silver Screen

How a crooner's good looks and golden voice led to stardom

An illustrated lecture presented by Dulais Rhys, Ph.D

Allan Jones was a gifted singer and accomplished performer, as seen in his superb portrayal of the good-looking hero and outstanding singer in 1930s movies such as Show Boat or The Firefly.

He also appeared in the limited role of a smooth crooner in the Marx Brothers' madcap movies, A Night at the Opera and A Day at the Races. These films remain highly popular, so today, Allan Jones is mostly remembered for his minor appearances in these movies.

Hollywood success did not happen overnight. Having decided from a young age that singing professionally was to be his future, as a high school student in Scranton, PA, Allan paid for singing lessons by working at a variety of part-time jobs – including in the coal mine, where his Welsh father (his first singing teacher) was the manager and where he survived many frightening accidents.

The proceeds of two benefit concerts held at Allan Jones's school then enabled him to study singing in France, where he learned dozens of operas and oratorios in several languages.

Back in the US, Allan Jones transferred his overseas experience to the stage which soon drew the attention of Broadway impresarios, the Shubert Brothers. Then an MGM talent scout saw Jones perform, wanted him for the silver screen in Hollywood and the singer found that his Shubert Brothers contract was difficult – and expensive – to break.

Allan Jones's eventual transition from stage to screen was not easy, primarily due to competition from MGM's stable of established singer/hero actors, such as Dick Powell and especially Nelson Eddy. Following a number of minor singing roles in insignificant movies, Jones's big break came in 1936 with winning the leading role of Gaylord Ravenal (over Nelson Eddy) in Paramount's extravagant film version of Show Boat (which also featured Paul Robeson). Greater success followed a year later as the leading man, Don Diego, in The Firefly, in which Jones starred opposite the legendary Jeanette MacDonald. It was in this movie that he sang 'The Donkey Serenade' for the first time, which – along with 'The Impossible Dream' from the musical, Man of La Mancha - became one of Allan Jones' signature songs.

During World War II, Allan Jones was among the first to 'sing for the troops', followed by a return to the stage, reprising his leading roles as Don Quixote in Man of La Mancha and Sky Masterson (written especially for him) in Guys & Dolls – two stage roles which are forever linked to his name. Allan Jones continued with singing tours and sporadic film or television appearances until his death in 1992.

Today, Allan's son, singer Jack Jones, continues his father's vocal legacy, singing the music that was so dear to his father and keeping Allan Jones's talents alive in the public eye and ear.

REFERENCES, REVIEWS & RECOMMENDATIONS

1. Specific to this Allan Jones lecture:

It was a pleasure to hear about the life of Allan Jones, a tenor of Welsh descent who had a colourful career on American stage and screen. Many episodes were supported by extracts from recordings and films making it an evening of entertainment as well as a lecture. Dr Rhys' own musical brilliance informed the research about this talented tenor, giving us an insight into Jones' life and the entertainment business of the 1930s and 40s.

[Dr. Rhys] managed to condense superbly into an hour the fascinating life of a somewhat forgotten star of 20th Century American radio, film and television. The amount of detail conveyed reflected a thorough research and knowledge of the subject. Yet the style of delivery was relaxing, and excellently interspersed with carefully chosen sound and film extracts. ... [Allan Jones's] fascinating career in Hollywood was superbly brought alive through Dr. Rhys blending of details of the individual with discussion of the context, including amusing anecdotes on the role of the movie moguls and rivalry between the stars.

I had the privilege of attending a lecture given by Dr Dulais Rhys, on the life of Allan Jones, the outstanding tenor of Welsh descent, born in Old Forge, Pennsylvania, who became a legend in the world of opera, musicals, and musical films, in America. ... Not surprisingly, Dr. Dulais Rhys's research into the life and achievements of Allan Jones was incredibly thorough and revealing...attributable to Dulais's brilliant delivery, supported by...extracts from both soundtracks and film that portrayed the remarkable singing and acting talent of Allan [Jones]. I would unhesitatingly delight in attending Dulais's outstanding lecture again.
